On April 26th the National Security Policy Center will host a series of public and private conversations on the Future of Counterterrorism at the University of Virginia.

The purpose of these discussions is to examine and reconsider our approach to counterterrorism in light of the evolving threats facing the United States. Topics will include radicalization, surveillance, detention, and prosecution.

The event will include a private off-the-record discussion in the Rotunda among counterterrorism experts, including current and former government officials and scholars. The capstone panel in the Rotunda is open to the public and will engage the University and broader national security community in a discussion about the direction of our counterterrorism policies and strategy.
